PREFATORY NOTE

Now index-learning turns no student pale
Yet holds the eel of science by the tail.

So Pope in his day might sneer. But his eel has since grown to a Leviathan, a Midgarth serpent, and indexes, however akin to Dullness, are indispensable. Nor is the making of an index so dull as might seem. It is, in fact, a work of imagination and memory. At every entry the compiler must stretch his imagination to include every reason, however curious, which a reader might have for consulting that entry. He must also remember not only the satisfactions he has enjoyed in a good index, but the exasperating frustrations he has suffered from a bad one. There are rules for index-making, of course, but rules that leave plenty of room for the maker's discretion. However mechanical the process, it may both amuse and entertain.

The names of the most frequent commentators I have omitted. If the index fails at any point, the Concordance, or C. H. Whitman's Subject-Index, or Sawtelle's or Lotspeich's studies of Spenser's mythology may pick up the trail.

An index to a single author is a simple task. An index to a hundred or two different commentators, in perverse disagreement on titles, names, terms, editions, texts, spelling, and often scant or careless in their references, is another matter. The attempt to reconcile these myriad differences and bring them into some sort of conformity has greatly delayed the compilation of this index. I can only hope that the reader's satisfactions may be many, and his exasperations—some are inevitable—may be very few.

To my friend, Dr. James Whaler, I am immeasurably indebted for help in reading the proof, and to the J. H. Furst Company for their skilful care and patience in producing this book.
